Considerable efforts are underway to improve the health of people with disabilities. Data is essential to this effort—it provides an ongoing snapshot and is key to evaluating the impact of our programs and policies addressing health promotion and prevention. In response to the demand for data, definitions of disability have become more science-based and questions on disability are now included in many federally sponsored surveys and information systems.

Join Dr. Boyle at Lakeshore Foundation for a seminar beginning at 12 PM where she will discuss: the “Why’s” and “How-to do’s” of disability measurement; what we know about the health of people with disabilities and factors impacting health; and major community-level strategies to address disparities in health. All who attend the seminar will be provided lunch.
